The paper we present today is located within so-called 'speaker-design' approaches to sociolinguistic variation, where the focus is on the pro-active agency of speakers, or, the ways in which speakers strategically deploy the different linguistic variables and varieties available to them, to achieve certain communicative outcomes.Â Examples of research on speaker agency include Eckert's work on 'jock' and 'burnout' identities in a Detroit area high school, Schilling-Estes's work on the conversational negotiation of friendship and ethnic identities in a Lumbee Native American community, and Coupland's study of the persona management of a Welsh pantomime performer. The mechanism involved in such agentive language use is well captured in John Gumperz' notion of contextualization.
