WE need to think again about Kipling. Or of the unforgettable, bloated, two-day corpse of Hirman Singh, from "In Flood Time", which the hero uses as an improvised life-jacket. Kipling's ear, though, was initially less perfect in particular the sometimes excruciating Irish of Mulvaney, which isn't properly perfected until "Love-Women" in Many Inventions. This faultiness is detectable, too, in the narrator's voice of Plain Tales from the Hills, where it is occasionally unclear whether Kipling endorses the tough moral pokerwork with which several stories begin. The stories of Rudyard Kipling are read all over the world, by people of all ages, yet no biography has fully explored the complex link between his fascinating life and his writing; until this one. Harry Ricketts brings Kipling vividly and touchingly to life - his traumatic childhood, split between India and England (haunting the powerful Jungle Books); his youth as a reporter in India, troubled by love and politics; his entry into London literary life and his often hilarious travels. So, when Kipling states, "If you can fill the unforgiving minute/With sixty seconds' worth of distance run," he is saying that with every minute that you are given, make the absolute most of it that you can. "Unforgiving minute" refers to the fact that every single minute is 60 seconds long-no more, and no less. So when that minute is up, it is gone, forever. You can't call it back to spend that time differently. A minute is not merciful; it doesn't slow itself down to give you more time, or tack on a few seconds, or take a few of here or there. Kipling's poem urges the reader to make the most of life while he can. Ironically, his own son John to whom this appears to be written, died at a very young age fighting in the war. check Approved by eNotes Editorial. sidmufc | Student.
