

Pidgin English is extremely popular in most parts of Africa, particularly West Africa, and has been accepted as the de-facto language of blue collar trade and merchants. Pidgin remains the "great equalizer" a way of communicating on a base level that cuts through bullshit. With roughly 250 tribes speaking 521 languages and dialects, English is the country's official business language. Variations of Pidgin English can be found all over the world, from the Caribbean to China, and each comes with its own library of everyday words. As you travel across West Africa, the style of Pidgin spoken becomes more familiar, but still differs based on local language elements infused into it.

Melanesian Pidgin or Neo-Melanesian language comprises three related English-based languages of Melanesia: Tok Pisin of Papua New Guinea. Pijin of the Solomon Islands. Bislama of the Vanuatu Islands. Micronesian Pidgin English, spoken in nineteenth-century Micronesia. Melanesian Pidgin English: Grammar, texts, vocabulary. Baltimore: Linguistic Society of America. Woolford, E. (1979). Variation and change in the i predicate marker of New Guinea Tok Pisin. In Wurm, S. (ed), Papers in pidgin and creole linguistics, no. 2. (Pacific Linguistics A57), Canberra: Australian National University. Wurm, S. (1971). New Guinea highlands pidgin: Course materials (Pacific Linguistics D3), Canberra: Australian National University.
