Parenting under pressure: a grounded theory of parenting young children with lifethreatening congenital heart disease. Journal of Advanced Nursing 69(3), 619-630. doi: 10.1111/j.1365-2648.2012.06044.x. Abstract Aim. Research is needed to determine the needs of both mothers and fathers and to develop appropriate community-based interventions. Through a qualitative study with parents of young children with HLHS who had undergone the Norwood surgical approach between 1997-2001 when the mortality rate was 50%, we identified a process of Safeguarding Survival (Rempel & Harrison 2007). It is recommended for anyone involved with this population." - Social Science and Medicine. In fact, support from parents varied considerably among students who maintained their interest in STEM throughout high school compared to those who lost interest in STEM (Aschbacher et al., 2010). Although the role of parental support, expectation, and pressure have been identified as key factors for students to pursue a STEM career and to maintain interest in STEM (Dabney et al., 2013), only few studies take a more detailed view on the role of parents by examining the impact of mothers and fathers for girls and boys separately: Research shows that.Â  Although research is limited, the few studies that focus on the role of mothers and fathers separately for boys and girls indicate that mother's and father's school related behavior are perceived differently by boys and girls.
