Problem: Itâ€™s the wrong book Itâ€™s the wrong edition Other. Group development theory. As a group or organization forms, it goes through certain predictable stages, progressing from a collection of individuals to a cohesive group working for a common cause. Two dimensions are present in any group and influence its development-task functions and personal relations. Four stages of group development. Stage I: Forming. Â Personal relations are characterized by dependency on the leader to provide structure. Â Major task functions concern the orientation of group members to the work they are being asked to do. The issues have to be specified. Â Common behavior The goal of most research on group development is to learn why and how small groups change over time. To do this, researchers examine patterns of change and continuity in groups over time. The fourth stage of group development is performing. Many groups never reach the performing stage. This is the stage at which would be an excellent customer service and to create an impressive examples. The group structure is in place and accepted by group members. In this stage, characteristics include productivity, full development of the potential of the group and the individuals in the group, harmony and effective problem-solving. This is the last stage of development for permanent work groups. 5. Adjourning. The final stage is adjourning.
