Although some of the images presented are not photographs in the purest sense, they and the accompanying text should, I feel, give any photographer who has done or attempted this type "photography" pause. Certainly a person can create finely crafted prints of images of ANY subject and I don't think there should be any laws against it. Photography and the Traffic in Pain. Ed. M. Reinhardt, H. Edwards and E. Duganne. Chicago: U of Chicago P, 2006. 93-115. Frames of War. When is Life Grievable? The photographs have become the event themselves as Stewart points out. We would think of the event as being a rite or myth. They turn into "a picture which becomes both the occasion for the event and a replacement for it. The photographs of the event themselves speak its effort toward transcendence: front is behind, behind is front, and all of history is stopped" (Stewart, p.123). (Part of my conference paper).
