In "Boys and Girls" the central character is a young girl who narrates the story about her life on a farm and about her search for gender identity. Through various episodes in the story we learn that the girl is courageous, strong, adventurous, and very imaginative. Some of those qualities are typically viewed as masculine strengths and would be normally used to describe a male character. The story is centered on gender roles of women and the girl must face and accept that her role is not outside with the pelting operation but more so in the kitchen father's service with her mother. It seemed to me that work in the house was endless, dreary, and peculiarly depressing, work done out of doors; and in my father's service was ritualistically important. We studied associations among parents' gender role attitudes, gender stereotyping in children's environments, and children's gender role attitudes and whether these associations were similar for...
