

I'd listen to my parents if they'd just shut up

By Anthony Wolf, PhD

I chose this book knowing it was written recently and I wanted to read about communicating with teenagers facing the challenging and completely different set of issues in the world today. The title also intrigued me by scaring me and making me laugh at the same time. It is written with useful insight and humor and I know it will be a useful guide when I need it.

Since we are learning now that teenagers may have selected hearing, this is a great title because the author offers suggestions of what is important and what is not. When to choose our battles and when to back off. When to say no, and when to make exceptions. Most importantly that the consequences of being too hard on a teenager may be detrimental by shutting them down further.

The book is broken into useful chapters and sub chapters that make it easy to go back to for reference and are written with humor which makes some of the difficult banter between the parents and teenagers a lot easier to get through.

Some of the topics covered:

- The cure for your teen's allergy to you
- Being with teens when they don't want to be with you
- Importance of saying " no"
- When to cave in.
- Dealing with back talk
- What to do when a teen throws you a curve

Things that are good to know:

- Completely normal for teens to contract a temporary allergy to their parents once they hit adolescence.
- This stage is short lived ( good news!)
- Teenagers acting out " baby selves" with us because they feel safe. This doesn't mean they are acting this way with people they do not know/ or in public.
- How they react towards to us is most likely not a reflection of how they act around other adults.

The author points out that teenagers can get stuck in a mindset ( their "baby selves") and not let go of their anger towards us when we tell them what to do, or what not to do. It's important for the parents not to get sucked in ( bringing out their own "baby selves ") to prove a point. If both parties are stuck in this mind set, the arguing can continue for days.

* Disengaging

The most important tool in this book. When to walk away from possible arguments that have no importance in the long run and could potentially shut their ears down for future conversations. Important to have them listen to the things that are most important like health & safety.

* Saying no.

Saying no and sticking to it but at the same time knowing when to give in (within reason) over things that you know will escalate into an unnecessary argument. If giving in, explain that this is an exception and explain the reason for the exception.

Rewards/ punishments.

Small allowance & technology time increases / decreases usually work better than huge punishment ( taking away a special class trip ) as the later may backfire by only making teenager more bitter.

Scaring them as many people thought best in the 50's is not the solution now as it may shut them down from us and later the teenager could react elsewhere. That is not to say we need to let them with everything when acting badly. It is just to say we shouldn't over react or take anything too personally.

Trying to use natural consequences when an unpleasant outcome becomes the direct consequence of an action not taken:

Instead of asking ( what a teenager usually hears as " nagging ") for days for your teenager to put dirty clothes in hamper, instead of taking away allowance, let them have dirty clothes ( page 82 )

Basically this book boils down to giving the reader tools to deal with how to deal with resistance and how best to disengage.

Wolf states " it is important to accept that you cannot control everything. You have to take chances because you don't really have a choice. Having a teenage child exposes you to the absolute probability that some things you really don't want to have happen will happen" ( page 168)

For example, a summary at the end of each chapter should've been provided with a sentence or two in bold which said "Here's what we just discussed..." 3) The example conversations all sounded unrealistic, almost as if made up by an adult to simulate what a teen sounds like, rather than taking actual conversations. I could not hear these words coming out of my own teens mouth.

Saying "no" is so difficult for my parents because it means they have to be difficult with me, which they wouldn't have to be if they were just reasonable sometimes, which they're not. And if they didn't treat me like a six-year-old, which they do, and which they wish I still was but "excuse me for living, I hate to disappoint them" is not. Teens Argue. Once you have said no to a teenager, whatever you may say subsequent to that no really doesn't matter all that much.
