According to Gray (1986), managing the corporate image is the key to security and maintaining public trust. This is particularly relevant today because of the American public's disenchantment with business (Cochran 1984, Dickson 1984, D'Aprix 1977, Gray 1986, Keller 1985, and Pinsdorf 1987). According to Velmans (1979) the corporation needs to become more conscious of using communications to reach its objectives and needs to articulate its position more clearly to government agencies, legislator, shareholders, employees, customers, financial institutions and other critical. The key take away from the Reputation Institute's study was that, unlike many other consumer products and services, banks are both challenged and struggling to recover from the negative sentiment caused by their role in the recession- in the eyes of consumers. And, banks needed a "theme" that not only resonates with the public interest but elevates the sense of esteem, trust, and admiration they engender.
