"An elderly man with Alzheimer's disease was the first patient of mine who fits the description you offered of an empathic near-death experience. Mr. Sykes, the man with Alzheimer's, declined quite rapidly for his illness and his age and died about a year after diagnosis. I got to know him and his wife quite well during our time together. "About two months before his death he lapsed into what I would call an almost vegetative state. It was a typical last stage of Alzheimer's disease. When Mrs. Sykes found out that Hugh had died suddenly, her husband's conversation with him took on another dimension for everyone at the bedside, said the hospice worker.
