Industrialization in capitalist societies ushered in the growth of trade unions and the development of union activities of industrial workers. In the late eighteenth and the early nineteenth centuries in the West when unionism began, trade unions took diverse forms. These forms varied by society and were significantly influenced by the country's specific historical background and socioeconomic and cultural conditions. Yet such diverse union structures began to merge into "industrial unionism" in the late nineteenth century, which embraced all types of workers within the boundaries of an industry.
