The link between the public opinion and public policy is fundamental to political representation. The current empirical literature tests a general model in which policy is considered to be a function of public preferences. The mechanics by which preferences are converted to policy are considered along with extensions of the basic model - extensions through which the magnitude of opinion representation varies systematically across issues and political institutions.  $\hat{P}$  where P designates policy and O opinion. This is not meant to be a complete model of policy of course, as we know that many other things also matter (Jacobs & Shapiro, 2000). The equation is used solely to characterize the general relationship between opinion and policy.
