Companies based on friction-free economy are disrupting entire industries. Accelerating change, creative destruction, and friction-free exchange are changes in the way the global economy is transforming, and there are vast opportunities for those who possess the brainpower, drive, ambition and excitement to learn. As technology shrinks the costs of running a business, many companies are unbundling themselves, outsourcing functions to others, crowdsourcing, and exchanging employees for contractors. Human capital becomes a service "available almost instantly. Medium to large businesses now hire Local markets were in charge of developing their own brand strategies. However, in recent years building a consistent and strong brand culture that remains familiar to consumers wherever it is in the world has become a priority. Tony Effik, chief strategy officer at Publicis Modem, explains: "A brand needs a single view of the world, a single philosophy." The rise of digital channels has shifted the brand emphasis from structure to culture, believes Neil Taylor, creative director at language consultancy The Writer. My point has to do with the relative cost of picking off Google's higher-value services by being better at search or ad placement in a particular category. In a competitive market, novelty constantly offers itself up and people frequently give it a try. In search, if a set of results about a particular topic are better than Google's, Google loses that kind of search in the future, a tiny change but one that adds up to the need to spend more to either improve Google results or coopt the competitor. For the price of a little server space, www.friction-free-economy.com would still be part of the dialog, but it is not. That's friction in action. It is always moving.
